In Voices of the Wandering, Grace Manning explores the concept of belonging through the disconnect that exists when one’s home isn’t defined by structure or established in childhood, but rather a by constantly changing and evolving ideal. Manning’s speaker draws inspiration and comfort from others who are living between countries and continents, using their voices and emotions to try and understand her own. South and West African experiences investigate the confusion and suffering that is colonialism, from blame, to hurt, to lifelong guilt, she introduces the perspectives of those on either side of the racial wall built during Apartheid. Using French to highlight language as a factor that has the power both to unite and to ostracize, the speaker ultimately allows for a duality of identity, intrinsic to a nomadic lifestyle. From the heat and surprise of Cameroon, to a France rocked by violence, to the wild Ireland of her childhood, Manning introduces a self that is shaped by an expatriate, and by a transient, existence.

sandra took me to the market on a saturday in late november the air was still summer i spent nights dreaming of handfuls of ice slipped into pockets our hands smelled like fish for hours the street wavered through heat delirious eyes thought i could feel mine liquify

i spent days waiting for an orb sun to move behind imaginary clouds my mind played tricks

i knew what it was like for the first time
to be afraid

when i forgot to buy water thought constantly about where i could get it next

the sky seemed closer every day

she told me to ask about chickens we needed four and the boy selling them laughed when i asked

told me,

tu les tues comme ça
and wrung the neck
of the one he held

the others clambered in wire baskets i looked for something in frantic eyes his friend got me a wheelbarrow showed me the best tomatoes crushed and seeping

the slick piments dangled in bunches above the butcher he flung entrails at hairless dogs his face covered in raised freckle blood drying

thrust fish into my arms

his sister was scaling them she stood on a shimmering mound

i told her i was from america she laughed deep in her throat and she told me i was french pffft she whistled through her teeth les américaines ne viennent pas en Afrique.

i came home

to find it tethered to the jagged edge of a broken pipe

it dragged a little bleated more softly than it would in the grey heat haze hours of morning when the papaya tree filled with tiny green birds their nests swollen woven tumors hanging from weakening branches their sound the rolling of thousands of stones would be only a part of the reawakening

it lived there for three weeks

swatting flies hovering around its patchy hair scaring little girls who ran around corners eating leftover batons de manioc and eru and fufu and whining before the morning could erupt stirring dust

into eye sockets and settle tacky hot over the city

it was a gift from a man who couldn’t pay his doctor in francs and so paid in this goat and three bags of sugarcane which we chewed up sucked out swallowed and spat

wads of woody pulp
into the gutter across the street already choked with debris from the last rain and then we ate it on a sunday i remember they had cut the lights and we ate in the dark the table still smelled like blood and animal and the heat that won’t let anything

go.
funeral sacrifice

it was an immaculate violence with holiness in its horror the utmost care

we were invited

stepped barefoot between sunburnt grass stamped up and down to shake off biting ants

the man beside me whispered

regardez

when i looked away from the blessing
the touching of shoulders palms up to impossibly blue sky the pressing of lips to brittle hair

the thanks passed between bent heads the pig’s eyes were whites rolled back so far they became alien silence in this circle

did not move to get away did not understand the machete wink

until it screamed
and i remembered
a fox scream

one night made me sit bolt upright in bed eyes open open open open the ache when i closed them again so like a child’s scream it made me panic paralyzed my brain too deep inside a dream to hear the creature

in the cry

under half baked afternoon sun i realized the red roads weren’t red not really not red like this not deep sloughed off of trembling body

ma soeur

dieu est là.
le peuple du forêt

sometime before the chimpanzees started their early morning calls and the trees

fell from the heavens

onto the forest
muted like bodies

he told me
they were looking for a world that was gone during the night

bewilderment slashed across their faces the violence of it too soft to be noticed the violence of it was not at a distance i could know it if i wanted too

if i held the weight of that freedom if i saw that the leaves here were Lion d'Or

empty red whiskey sachets ground into the lobes of this river shuffled under dragging feet that once walked miles to find elephant drinking holes deep in the jungle

that ran with lowland gorillas and grieved for their dead

for weeks that sadness was strength for eyes that never saw sky above all those frothing trees

how can they grieve now that the sky is right there now that i can see it too even if i don’t know what it was like not to even if i cannot ever know now that the forest is silent and stripped now that time is still and the only movement is that of weary notes passing between hands.

little faces

heat that makes my fingers heavy the ones they strain to hold clamber at me

little faces smeared in sugar dimpled with crumbs want to touch me all over and for once

i let them

exploring my face like it will help them know me

understand why i am here when even i cannot begin to

heavy lidded eyes no reason to be searching open captured between the oblivion of dreams cradled by night and the push

to be children of the day their blue startles me and zippers hanging off of uniforms stained pink with dust clouds puffed white

sugared with chalk showers

they blow and can’t see the shimmer of it in afternoon light staining copper roofs and i wish fingers could feel this could reach for slipping sun and catch it before it sidles behind watching mountains before it casts little faces in this palm warm clay. the man on the corner selling avocados has a face like the whorled creased roots of an ancient tree waits only for the sun as it creeps across the line of plump greens and browns back and forth and i standing on the painted rock on the edge of the city have never known change like this have never been more terrified of myself altered by hills frilled in palm sloping and pregnant with plantain and papaya burst with a sunset red and dripping to match roads that curl off into jungle that slice deep into wild

i remember when slow moving smoke tendrils slipping between my teeth made my heart stop when whisper of sand warm lizard across my feet hum of the forest brought more than the clamber of feathering clouds swollen with rain.
in a taxi cab

looking back to when dusty streets bathed in end of a lifetime light thrummed under empty skies and how i felt

realized smoke choked wind through cracked glass and slivers of mountains and hot newspaper from strange hand and the smell when drenched forest meets baked land

that hiss you can hear under everything else

how it could be everything to me and how i could let it

how slick coins passed under blood warm rain

watching this flood from under hanging banana leaves all these bodies pressed under the weight of a slipping mountain lost in streets carved into hills rivulets of red road meeting heels running to run running

to get to where i have been waiting all this time.
portrait

i was bizarrely startlingly

out of place like i always was

here
i had gotten used to being noticed secretly salivated over invisibility

secretly ached
for obscurity

irrationally
consumingly

i envied the women
draped in folds

their slipping
into an uneasy existence when i feel like i am always forcing

fighting my own

their hands clasp reflect the heat

that makes the peppers glisten enormous melons

waver mirages
strewn over packed ground trampled under creased feet la tête?

blushed flesh thick rubber it sat and waited and listened les oreilles

i answered and they were passed from his hands to mine

the strength in his movements his pale palms veined with blood it was all people and shouting and thrusting and tossing of burlap bags to burst powdered manioc settling kids ran in it

tossed it in the air like snow the closest they would get in all the brown green in all the hovering

red mist

one boy kicked a three legged dog under the butcher table his snout glued to the wood his tongue desperately seeking out the life dregs oozing between splinters.

thirst

there’s a place in the gorse-choked Kerry mountains where my uncle said you could drink the water that it was better than anything anywhere

e else

we were wild there scaled rocks slick with moss fell into guinness lakes frothed with foam

caramel colored we sat

in high backed reed patches to rest

to watch the rain batter the field in front of us but never get close enough towhead hair left spiderweb strands on tree branches clumped with fleece we crouched

on bristled banks and drank clung onto boulders

hung over waterfalls until our mouths hurt

novocain numbness
made our cheeks swell sometimes we ate wild garlic or slurped

the sticky sweet from honeysuckle

we wouldn’t see another person in all that big empty

under all that sky and those wind shorn mountains hollows left by the ones who made walls and crumbling houses seeping into land felt lonely

in the way that makes your lungs swell in your chest

a kind of loneliness you can spend your whole life searching for.

my sister and i

used to rescue baby birds walked them far from the melting sun seared road in the pouches of our shirts they lived only hours tucked in shoeboxes under our beds shrieking horribly into the night their beaks

cavernous
we dripped

eye droppers of warm water couldn’t remember

what cold water felt like what it tasted like back then thought of metal under my tongue

made me miss the things i couldn’t remember

couldn’t will into that place behind my eyes

where they live and hover and wait suspended

we were kept awake
so long

by the want of tiniest bodies

that when they went quiet i was too tired to notice like that time we were sitting under half moon

dune shadows
and she pointed

the darkness
unmistakably

the speed of it the power

made its way down the coast we ran after it

breathless burning chest high on the stomach pit fear of this thing

living so easily

in a troubled world.
Imagination, of course, can open any door - turn the key and let terror walk right in.
— Truman Capote, In Cold Blood

my little sister slept in the suitcase or maybe in the dresser drawer because she was the smallest it was logical

and my parents neglected to mention her to the nuns we ate with them

when they got up with the early grey sun stale toast and chocolate in the bare kitchen black instant coffee

we had to be back before curfew or if we weren’t drunk on Italian wine swaying into each other my parents snuck us back in through the shadowed courtyard we slept heavy

those nights

my hand wandering
into my sister’s face

bumpy and scabbed
she had skidded on it

running up spanish steps to scatter pigeons

i could almost forget how unhappy i was back then

when the cloth wrapped clothespin dolls in a drawstring bag under my pillow were my parents’ hope more than my own

that all the insidious things like the shell mirror and the plastic cookie monster mug wouldn’t empty me like they did sometimes when i was ten

that i wouldn’t spend hours thinking about in cold blood that family murdered that family murdered that family murdered that family murdered that family

murdered

i read it three times in a week could remember every detail even if i couldn’t remember the last time that i closed my eyes

even if i knew
i could never keep it

apple blossom pale gold dripping fever dreams

warm ice cream licked off nickel burned wrist

even if i knew
i could never live in that without sitting in this almost dark breath caught

somewhere above my ribs

mind winking
like a stoplight

when there are no stars.
touët est pardonné

they said
we were all charlie

in the weeks after we went to the marches

my dad
put my sister on his shoulders someone said

la petite

il faut que vous voyez said when asked

on pleure pourquoi?
that some violence

comes from god

is holy marches

where the prophet cried in all our hands bled neon green and cartoon puffed on our coats

muhammed assuring us everything everything

is forgiven lifted up where for once the silence was understood where holding hands meant we were together

not against but inside

this grief and there is something about grieving with thousands that made me want to forgive him even when i wasn’t sure yet that he had done anything wrong even when i would never be sure but i would have this push on my ribs

this ocean splayed distance and it made me think that blame

is the most dangerous animal.

mal de débarquement

when my sister left her home she stopped eating

since everything
everything

made her sick and when I hugged her

it was all hollow spaces and creaking wind through smooth bone

her heart protruded convex and she wrote eulogies to the place she lost

in thick lines big letters paper scraps

sucked her thumb again the flat right one always wrinkled it remembered her mouth in a way that was comforting when nothing else

was

and I think she was grieving that grief

when you’re small is strange

your mind loses your body for a while and when it catches up it forgets what comes first and I was like her too before

and it reminded me of when we played airplane and her body hung over mine when she slipped off and stood up to go again and only I saw her distorted arm had to widen horror eyes for her to know the chaos under blade thin skin her mind too far behind to recognize the brokenness.

hunger

to wish you didn’t see death
the first time

when it was hot and animal and slipped down the street

crept in through the window left open

in fever damp summer in clawing dark

in sleep
or in the almost light

when you thought of it when it came to empty you before the swell of flesh this thick softness

unwinding lazily
above the ground

seemed monstrous
the great head turned your first time seeing something so bloodless

stained stone footprints rumored

of unspeakable crime not of this particular human

hunger.
if i am from here

i am in ireland
the smell is close and damp its land belly distended lies like a small beached animal breathes peat smoke sweet enough to flavor

a low sky

my childhood is drunk

on savage wind
on water

that could reach up cliffs that could crawl over earth could fling chunks of foam flecked with salt saliva

i was filled with shrugged off dirt

gulps of air laced with rain

i was fed
out a car window

to tempt the wild

this home was beer breath warmed

in loud like comfort
this time

i remember
quieter woods but i remember leaving most

the loss of something the gain of something else

but i am followed or maybe i am lived in

for a while by a place that is not mine does not want to be like i want it to

and i wonder sometimes

if i am allowed to miss it

this much.
anthem

in this crowded room
i thought

i could sing an anthem like it belonged to me because i could feel it in my body

like a hum
in my throat

before it is even music

because i was dressed like a small stunted man was so proud

i didn’t take the blazer off or the tie even when i was home and america was the whole sun again

and the anthem was pretending

and my feeling
was like a trick

of the eye except of my arms and legs and stomach

i was betrayed

not beloved by this country and america was summer it was driving across the border skin sucking off leather wind roaring

there was no relief

from tacky heat
but it was america

i watched my mom her whole being

as it breathed out let something go

i wished i could breathe these places

in and out

like she could.
diagnosis

my bitterness is smaller i think

it shrunk and it can float now

i am careful
because it looks like

proof that an empty capsule pink placebo dust

is medicine to some minds

not to believe it

when i was angry at you for taking things from me and people when i thought about being the same

but so much younger and everything was strange but it kept happening

anyway and i didn’t know my mind could be still and i was angry because i thought you knew and she is so much like me it seems unforgivable

she walks through the world
with the same fierce blue trembling

like there is a screen and behind it is

just another world
thin enough

to walk through.
untouchable

selling sunflowers
sliced off stalks

glowed in the dark
of this almost day

cut through heat and air so choked with people

i could taste the human this frenzied grip on life he held my hand for a moment

and i was afraid of its warmth

felt like i might somehow see myself there

beside him with seared eyelids hanging this boy

made me feel like i might be buried there under towers of leaves waiting to be spices

under men who grabbed pulled thrust threw rainbow tarps caught indian sun in hammocks

let it pool there instead of on all our waiting faces. the airport in abu dhabi made me feel like a crab like the ones we used to scoop from the sand

clumsy fingers
pulled off legs by mistake left it disfigured we watched it limp around the bottom of a plastic bucket forgot about it

in the blue of late summer remembered it

when the water was boiled and cooled

when the crab was a mound in a bucket groove again that was how it was to be looked at to be examined

to be the object of seeing i struggled under several bags where is your hijab? he demanded as i sweated in still air and fluorescent lights i remembered it was better not to look at him

someone had told me that once i think

shaking my head i pushed forward waited for a hand to turn me i didn’t see one woman in all those filled spaces couldn’t figure out why that made me afraid i looked at the cracked floor kept my head a little lower my eyes down fought the alien urge to cover my head hair face thought about the crab curled and curved in submission

to my accidental cruelty knew i wouldn’t be able to hide this me for a very long time.

this place

ok i tell myself
ok
you are here

kneel down for a minute crouch if you need to in warm body waves pushing touch wood rougger here it is like you unfinished

touch ground hold the hand of the woman next to you forget the offer is strange realize it is comforting realize she can hear the newborn in your throat

the bare fragility the exposure smell pollen soaked flowers it is clean

smell dust blown sun baked bricks glow orange like green on brown like sunrise over raped city urging buildings to struggle upwards sit up dig out fight again this war i can see

in all the eyes under all the feet

i am not hardened and i do not know how to be anything else do not know yet that this absence of closed off spaces this wanting

this naked hunger doesn’t have to make me weak.
superior

this is what it is
he says

to think they are better in every way

of the mind body
soul

to think that human is not my human their god

lives here in a flooded city

watches houses drown under their own yellowing hills shrugs says construits trop bas

watches death as it is now a child

they say français
and we worship their country we trade ourselves for it die slowly

under vibrating bellies of this greatest human feat in the cold that is only found higher than breath and still maybe we think this is achievement

at last we think we have arrived in our own land even in death
even in too soon death that laughs at our promise they say camerounais his voice is still

and we cannot see our reflections

in this mirror
they hold.
do we have an identity? that is the question forgetting who we are

is not me forgetting or her forgetting

it is the forgetting of a generation

throw of his arms and the lizards flinch

we are sitting under an overhang watching the bumpy grey of the abandoned airstrip the waste fires murmur on the other side of the mountain the papaya tree dangles hot and heavy and sweet the one in my hand

mimics the curved spine of an infant

even its warmth
its soft strange life

spoon presses into flesh rests forgotten

the birds cluster they are loudest in the mornings insistent at the thinly barred windows

his hands rest on his work obscure it

the dust clouds of someone coming someone going
meet slow smoke

over the valley
and his sadness

on his breath
and

that is all
he speaks

ask where we come from

when we have only ever lived here

tell me a thief more cruel and

accomplished
tell me a people who can know this when even their

selves
their sleep drunk essence are still buried somewhere in this valley

think of all the bones and souls

he tells me think of all the faces. how did you experience apartheid?

i was guilty
she says

because of my whiteness because for so long

i didn’t even know it
from blackness

we played in the same dirt

spent days in pursuit of the same joy

our fathers worked hard in dust clambering flies woke in dark and slept through the high sun hours

when clear blue and stillness meant death

my mothers were two white from birth

and black afterwards taught me to speak

like she did with her family taught me to cook

her husband showed me how to be soft and silent

how to be peace on the back of an animal

one thousand times stronger than myself

to feel its blood stretch through its body to feel its heartbeat on a damp neck under my palms to know it

i am proud
now

she says
her words her mouth are certain to be south african i can allow myself this much when before my pride had a price

too high to admit

and it has taken me
a long time to learn how to carry this.

how is this country a part of you?

anger and confusion and hurt and guilt

she says
that is so deep its roots are forever and sometimes i wonder

at it
that it can grow

even in the dry season when you can see the wind

as it picks up the road and coats the cars and the people and nothing is clean for long

it is painted with this land but there is hope and grace there is human kindness here too

we are all these things
and i wonder

that i could learn from someone who looks like me

and could think i know things

that i was so deep inside

i thought this particular guilt lives only here

that this land is calculated divide like nowhere else
that i had to leave

what i knew to see that this guilt is not only ours to dig out scratch out of earth

uncover with trembling hands

its shallow grave.
do you see your country the same way?

it is still our home

i don’t need much convincing his children wear coats

exchange reluctantly cities charged

electric with heat
for this quiet

crowd of mountains
emptied into fields

too gorged
to grow like

we want them to

shoes for school they are bewildered

he says

it is our people our opportunity

and
our challenge

his childhood was a kind of dying

of a country
with all the writhing

and grasping of an evil that saw its own death but fought it

anyway
the convulsions of land that meant nothing was safe

not even ground
he was taught to suspect

solid floors taught to believe that even this country this whole

anchored by earth and water can be shaken

can be severed and sewn back up to remind of the joy

the hope the promise

in the trembling glass of these

once broken things.
do you consider yourself to be african?

i am an african
he speaks

and i do not find hesitation

even buried in his words

only maybe a kind of will

he explains

all our family is there our life our customs

our language is african only we are tasked with this it is our work

our hurt and our home

maybe we do not look back as far as we can to know this is not enough

my parents fought against

but some fought for

and we are all in the comfort of our place and time

it is the horrors
we will look at the times we were afraid of a change so great

the times we went hungry or cold

the times we heard
war

and wondered if there could be better than this wondered if

change meant us

instead of them.
Notes

On superior and do we have an identity? that is the question

I spoke with Professor Ambroise Kom, a black Cameroonian man who is considered by many to be primarily a writer and a journalist but considered by himself to be an educator. He was a friend, a mentor and a teacher during my time in Yaoundé, Cameroon. One of his many passions is education surrounding colonialism. In his own words, “The fundamental issue with colonialism is its superiority complex. Colonizers believe that they are humanly, culturally, spiritually, intellectually superior to the colonized. From that standpoint, colonized people must forget their identity, their values and their history to embrace those of the colonizers.”

On how did you experience apartheid? and how is this country a part of you?

I interviewed Pam Volpert, a white South African woman who left her country when her three children were small and moved to Ireland. She now lives in Jersey in the Channel Islands. After struggling with guilt from apartheid all her life, she now believes, “We still face many challenges but as a nation we are strong, willing and able to move forward. We ask forgiveness for our past and we acknowledge that we still haven’t got it perfect. We are proud of many fellow South Africans (Mandela, Barnard, Semenya …) and proudly South African.”

On do you see your country the same way? and do you consider yourself to be african?

I interviewed Henri Louw, a white, South African man who grew up during Apartheid and left shortly after with his family to live abroad. In his own words, “my family traces its origins back to 1657, as part of the Dutch settlement founded in what is now Cape Town. I grew up in a small mining town on the eastern side of Johannesburg. I am an African. Born in 1980, my early childhood years were in the dying days of the Apartheid regime.”
